

M. Anne Brown is a Senior Research Fellow at the School of Political Science and International Studies, The University of Queensland. Research and applied interests focus on approaches to building political community across division and difference, peace-building and state formation in hybrid states, and social dialogue processes. She has been visiting and researching in Timor-Leste since 2002.

Sam Carroll-Bell is a graduate from RMIT University with a Master in Social Science (International Development). He has worked with the Globalism Research Centre and is now Research Co-ordinator for The Centre for Sustainable Organisations and Work at RMIT University. He is also President of the arts advocacy group Artists for Human Rights and Action and a founding member of the anti-human trafficking organisation Stop.Traffick Australia. Sam's research explores the framing and impact of international development activities.

Antonio Coa is a lecturer in Public Administration at the National University of Timor-Leste.

Jose da Costa Magno was formerly Dean of the Faculty of Social and Political Science at the National University of Timor-Leste. He has established with Mateus Tilman a local NGO, The Conflict Management and Action Research Centre, which is involved in a range of activities including renegotiating tarabandu. He has recently completed a higher degree in Portugal.

Deborah Cummins is an Associate at the Peace and Conflict Studies Institute of Australia (PaCSIA), a visiting lecturer and researcher in the department of Community Development at the National University of Timor-Leste (UNTL), and a consultant and trainer on local governance, decentralisation, democratisation, human rights and women's political participation. She has been working on local governance issues in Timor-Leste since 2008.

Damian Grenfell is the Director at the Globalism Research Centre at RMIT University, and regularly works in and visits Timor-Leste.

Alex Freitas Gusmao is Executive Director of the Anti-Corruption Commission of Timor-Leste. At the time of researching this essay, he was Director of Timor Aid and a lecturer in Community Development at the National University of Timor-Leste. Alex has written or co-authored a number of articles and book chapters, both about issues of corruption and about the interaction of local and national approaches to governance and peace-building.

David Hicks is a Life Member of Clare College, University of Cambridge, and Professor of Anthropology at Stony Brook University. He holds Doctor of Philosophy Degrees from the University of Oxford and the University of London and his scholarly specialisations lie in the fields of politics, oral literature, ritual, Indonesia and East Timor, in both countries of which he carried out field research.

He has published extensively, including Tetum Ghosts and Kin (2004) and Readings in the Anthropology of Religion (2010). Professor Hicks can be contacted at david.hicks@stonybrook.edu

Maria Madalena Lete Koten is a lecturer in Public Administration at the National University of Timor-Leste. She is currently undertaking a higher degree in Portugal.

Andrew McWilliam is a Senior Fellow in Anthropology in the College of Asia and the Pacific, The Australian National University. He has researched widely on the ethnography of Timor. Recent publications include the edited volume (with Elizabeth G. Traube), Land and Life in Timor-Leste: Ethnographic Essays (2011, ANU E-Press). E: andrew.mcwilliam@anu.edu.au

Gordon Peake is a Visiting Fellow at the State, Society and Governance in Melanesia Program, Australian National University. He is writing a book entitled Beloved Land: Stories from Timor-Leste. He lived and worked in Timor-Leste from 2007–11.

Martinho Pereira is Dean of the Faculty of Social and Political Science at the National University of Timor-Leste. His primary disciplinary focus is Study of Government.

Elda da Silva is a lecturer in Public Administration at the National University of Timor-Leste. She is currently undertaking a higher degree in Portugal.

Abel Boavida dos Santos was co-ordinator for the School for Activists at the Sahe Institute for Liberation from 2002–6. He is now Director of Community Development at the National University of Timor-Leste. He holds a Masters Degree from the Universitas Kristen Satya Wacana Salatiga, Indonesia.

Mateus Tilman is a lecturer in the Faculty of Social and Political Science at the National University of Timor-Leste. He formerly worked with the Ministry of Justice. With Jose da Costa Magno he started a local NGO, the Conflict Management and Action Research Centre, which was among other things involved in the process of renegotiating tarabandu.

Emily Toome graduated with a Master in Social Science (International Development) from RMIT University in 2012 and has undertaken research in and published on Timor-Leste. She currently works for the Globalism Research Centre and the Centre for Sustainable Organisations and Work at RMIT University.

Lynsze Woon is a RMIT University, Master of Social Science (International Development) graduate. She is also a Matadalan Ba Malu committee member, a group established to facilitate scholarships for women from Timor-Leste to participate in English-language training in Melbourne. Through her research she explores gender and development in post-conflict Timor-Leste, and the various ways in which these concepts are framed and constituted at the state and local level.